MANAGER COMMENTARY

The year so far has seen equity markets rise, reversing some of the losses seen last year. 2022's big sector loser, information technology, has rebounded and the big winner, energy, is down a little. Performance has been slightly behind the benchmark for the fund with a relative drag from the information technology sector, offset by continued outperformance of communications and professional services companies.

Corporate results season has so far demonstrated robust performance for the portfolio, with results perhaps a little better than we expected with just over half of the portfolio having provided an update. Average revenue growth is in the high single digits, but against expectation operating margins have also expanded slightly overall. There are variant performances between sectors – consumer goods firms like Nestlé and Unilever saw the most pressure on margins, but services companies such as Wolters Kluwer and Publicis had a positive experience, along with healthcare firms Sanofi and GSK. We expected the free cash flow generated by the portfolio to fall and it has, but only slightly and there is a sense from businesses that they expect some of the most acute pressures to ease this year; transportation brokerage C H Robinson reported that ocean rates are back to pre-pandemic levels on some shipping lanes for example.

The fund went through its 2023 financial year end at the end of February, and for the year the dividend distribution was up +8.0% over 2022. The distribution now sits +5.6% above the 2020 level, with the intervening years affected by the coronavirus pandemic.

The return to robust dividend growth is backed by the solid operating performance noted above and prudent distribution levels. The 2.0% historic dividend yield of the fund is backed by a 4.7% free cash flow yield, meaning the portfolio's companies have capacity to grow dividends and cope with further economic volatility should it arise.
